

Segment 8: Headquarters

Segmentation of demand in office market

8.1 Headquarters: Introduction

The headquarters segment comprises the central administration of multi-branch companies or companies in the financial services, insurance, telecommunications and pharma branches. The central administrative functions of these head offices require a very prestigious location in central commercial districts of cities, in single tenant buildings with their own entrance and reception area for receiving customers. Consequently the external appearance and visibility of the building is very important. Headquarters look for distinctive modern or architecturally superior buildings. They place value on a well-connected location.

Headquarters demand a good location, both micro and macro. The mainly international business activity and employee preferences call for an urban environment. These buildings may be owned by the company. Various additional bonuses, such as staff restaurants, nurseries and fitness rooms increase employee satisfaction and productivity and help in recruiting the desired staff. Headquarters seek to use space efficiently by adapting offices to their purposes. Open space and desk sharing are frequently used office concepts. A flexible interior adapted to use is very important so rooms in (superior) building shells are preferred. The location decision is taken at the highest level but is first considered by a project team with competence in this area. Prestigious architecture is an important criterion and the decision takes into account not just the initial costs but also running costs.

8.2 Headquarters: Examples of fictional businesses

The following examples provide an indication of the segments of demand. They are often exaggerated and may reflect clichés. They do not have a scientific foundation.

Telecommunications firm Just Call

The central office of the Just Call telecommunications firm is located in a new tower block that is part of an up-and-coming service district bordering the central business district (CBD). The glass block exudes prestige thanks to its distinctive and eye-catching architecture. This has given rise to a corporate architecture, i.e. the building and the company brand have merged in Just Call Tower. The entrance hall is raised and the floor is covered in marble tiles.
